An example of a typical signal is a video signal, that is, a digital video signal. With a video signal, for example, digital television broadcasts or computer graphics are handled. A signal processing apparatus that uses the digital signal can process the digital signal by performing so-called digital signal processing. Examples of the digital signal processing include image processing, audio processing, character processing, and waveform processing. For example, a digital television system, which is a television system in which the digital signal is used, includes a display, a tuner, and a digital signal processor (DSP). The display displays images by using the video signal. The tuner receives television signals or other video signals through a cable. The tuner supplies a digital signal to the DSP. The DSP performs a predetermined process or the like on the digital signal and then supplies the digital signal to the display. The DSP is often incorporated in a tuner because the DSP generally includes a filter, and therefore, the number of components is small.
